

THE POWER OF VISION (1)

The Kedusha of the Eyes

The reason Yerushalayim was established to be the center for Torah learning was that the talmidim there would see its great kedusha and the kohanim involved with their avoda. This would increase their yiras Shamayim and Torah learning.

(תוס' בבא בתרא כ"א ע"א)

From the AriZal we learn that eyesight connects a person with the subject being viewed, and whatever one sees leaves an impression on his neschama, for better or worse. Thus an ostrich that can hatch its eggs just by looking at them.

(ס' הליקוט' פ' קדושים, קב הישר פ"ב)

When Basya, King Paroh's daughter, heard an infant's cry and opened the basket floating on the water, she was moved by a strong rachmanus for the baby. Though the midda of rachmanus is a Yiddishe characteristic, Basya was able to feel it, because looking at a tzaddik leaves a strong impression.

(תורת יחיאל שמות)

Seeing Tzaddikim

The Navi Yeshaya says, "Vehayu einecha ro'os es morecha," – "Your eyes should look upon your mentor." Chazal learn from here that much can be gained by seeing the face of a tzaddik, such as a Rebbe.

Rebbi Yehuda HaNasi attributed his superior sharpness in learning, comparative to the other tanno'im, to his having seen Rebbi Meir's back. He added that if he had seen the face of Rebbi Meir, his mind would have become even sharper.

Conversely, the chachomim relied less on the teachings that Rav Sheishes heard after he lost his sight, since he was then unable to see the gestures that his Rebbe had made while teaching.

(ישעי' ל, כ, עירובין יג ע"ב, ירושלמי פ"א ה"ב)

Chazal relate how Yosef HaTzaddik was saved from committing an aveira when he saw the image of his father in a vision. In addition, the AriZal writes that envisioning the image of one's Rebbe can help him understand a difficulty in learning.

(סוטה לו ע"ב, מדבר קדמות ערך ציור)

At a farbrengen (ש"פ ראה תשמ"ו), the Rebbe said that through envisioning the image of a Rebbe, one can be aroused in an exceptional way, and have all obstacles removed. Speaking of the Frierdiker Rebbe, the Rebbe said that even those who never saw him in real life can accomplish this by looking at a picture.

(התועודיות תשמ"ו ח"ד ע' 311)

A Yid who had committed many grievous aveiros once asked the tzaddik Reb Motte Chernobyler to show him a path to teshuva. Seeing his pan, the tzaddik told him, "I am too old to handle this. Go to the Ruzhiner and he will help you."

The Yid traveled to the tzaddik of Ruzhin, and gave him the note listing all his wrongdoings. After reading it, the tzaddik instructed the Yid that from that day on, he should say every single word of davening and benching from a Siddur, even the bracha of Asher Yotzar. He further instructed him to look at his face the entire time he was at his tish. The Yid did as the tzaddik had directed and reached great heights.

(דברי דוד כ"ב ע"ב)

In the Ukrainian city of Kremenchug there lived many devout and learned Yidden, including generous philanthropists who funded the many communal needs. One of them, the exceptionally prosperous owner of a flourmill, had many dealings with elite Russian officials. Over time, he left the path of Yiddishkeit completely and, proud of his riches and impressive connections, spent his time socializing with Russian ministers.

Once, while in Petersburg for business, he heard that the Rebbe Rashab was then in town, staying in a hotel. Though steeped in worldly desires, he had a strong desire to see the Rebbe, who was known throughout the world for his wisdom and kedusha. He arrived at the hotel when chassidim were being admitted to yechidus, but was refused entry by the chossid in charge.

The affluent businessman attempted to enter by force. Hearing the commotion, the Rebbe Rashab opened the door and motioned that he should be allowed in. As he entered and beheld the Rebbe, he was suddenly filled with awe and fear. He could not utter a word. The Rebbe calmed him and asked why he had come. Finally, the Yid was able to reply, "I did not come for anything; I just came to see." The Rebbe gave him a bracha and he left.

Years later, this wealthy man related, "From the moment I saw the Rebbe, I changed completely. Seeing his holy face made a deep impression on me. I have seen great ministers and leaders of the kingdom, but never felt any fear. Yet when I saw the Rebbe, an intense awe overcame me and I decided to change my ways. When I arrived home, I got rid of all my dishes and closed my mill on Shabbos."

In due course he became a proper Yid in every way and formed a strong connection to the Rebbe.

CONSIDER THIS!

- Is the impact of vision a natural effect or a ruchniyusdike one?
- Will every person who sees a tzaddik be transformed? Why not?

A WAY OF LIFE

RABBI CHAIM CHAZAN

'Kofin al Middas Sedom'

A group of people bought condos in a building and share ownership of the hallways. The owner of the only apartment on the top floor wishes to extend his apartment by closing in the hallway, and claims that the other residents will lose nothing for that space is only used to enter his apartment. Some of the other residents refuse to give consent. Must the owner of the top floor apartment take their objection into consideration?

- One who lived in another's property, without the owner's permission, is exempt from paying when the said property is not usually rented out. Although by doing so, the squatter has saved himself from paying rent for the time he resided in the other's property, we say "zeh nehneh" - the squatter benefited – "vezeh lo chaser" – the owner lost nothing, and the squatter is therefore exempt¹.
- Many *rishonim*² hold that this exemption applies only after the fact, but regarding a current situation, the owner may refuse to allow the squatter to live in his property even if he will lose nothing. If the squatter then ignores the protest of the owner, he would be obligated to pay.
- However, other *rishonim*³ hold that Beis Din can force the owner to allow the squatter to live there for free in a case where the owner could not rent out the property even had he wanted to, based on the principle that we force a person not to behave like the people of Sedom (where they would refuse to assist others even at no cost to them).
- Practically, *poskim*⁴ rule that since it is an unresolved dispute, we are unable to obligate one to allow another to use his property, for he can say, "I hold like the first opinion which says that an owner cannot be forced ('kim li')."
- Moreover, even according to the second opinion, we can only force the owner to allow another to use the property, but it would never be permissible for the squatter to build on the property. For even though the owner is unable to use it, we cannot force him to completely forfeit his property⁵.
- In the case of the penthouse top floor apartment, it would follow that the owner cannot evoke the principle of 'kofin al middas Sedom' to force the other residents to agree to his extension, since (1) the issue is an unresolved debate and (2) because the extension results in the others being deprived of their property.
- However, some *batei dinim*⁶ do force neighbors to agree in such circumstances. Perhaps their reasoning is that they see shared property as being there for the benefit of the residents. If for whatever reason the builder did not utilize a particular space, and later it becomes possible to take advantage of that space (for all the residents or for one of them), no claim can stop it from being used⁷.

OUR HEROES

Reb Volf Kitzes

Reb Ze'ev Volf Kitzes, a great talmid of the Baal Shem Tov, was known as a gaon in all areas of Torah. He often joined the Baal Shem Tov in his travels, and frequently represented his Rebbe in confrontations with the misnagdim. He passed away on the 12th of Cheshvan and is buried in the ohel of the Baal Shem Tov.

Reb Volf once joined the Baal Shem Tov for a meal, but did not eat from the meat which was served. He later explained that he had refrained because the meat had not been salted in the best manner, and he had chosen to be machmir.

The Alter Rebbe addresses the obvious question: How can it be that Reb Volf was more machmir than his own Rebbe? Was the Rebbe's behavior not good enough for him?

The Alter Rebbe explains that the reason for all chumros which are beyond basic halacha are (not merely out of concern that perhaps it may not be kosher, rather) to separate the good from the bad (birurim). The mixture of bad in good and the way to 'separate' them is dependent on the ruchniyusdike level of the particular individual. This is why in our generation we have many more chumros than there had been during the times of Chazal, since we are on a lower level than them. Similarly, Reb Volf, recognizing the greatness of the Baal Shem Tov, did not attempt to elevate that which only his Rebbe could.

The Alter Rebbe asserts that for this reason we can never learn a halacha from the conduct of a tzaddik, not lekulah nor lechumrah.

A MOMENT WITH THE REBBE

Not to Disturb the Rebbe

The Rebbe's bittul to the Frierdiker Rebbe was unparalleled. At the meals, the Rebbe would seldom talk, and would drink in his father-in-law's words with thirst. Reb Sholom Ber Aichorn, who served as an assistant in the home of the Frierdiker Rebbe, relates an interesting episode:

"The Frierdiker Rebbe had finished the meal, bentched, and was getting up to leave. Usually, the Rebbe would get up to accompany the Frierdiker Rebbe out, but his time, he remained seated.

"After the Frierdiker Rebbe left the room, we realized what had happened. One leg of the table had broken during the meal, and the Rebbe did not want the issue to disrupt the Frierdiker Rebbe's talking. So he wedged his own leg under the table, in a way that it held up the entire table. This took enormous strength.

"As soon as the Rebbe got up, the entire table collapsed!"
